THE POST-2015 DEVELOPMENT FRAMEWORK (PART 1)

Bold but practical: incorporating peace and security in the new global development framework

By Sebastien Babaud and Ben Stevenson, Saferworld

The EU has a responsibility to ensure that the post-2015 development agenda addresses the difficult questions of peace and security by looking at the evidence of what works in conflict-affected and fragile states.

The global debate on what will replace the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) when they expire in 2015 is well under way at the United Nations (UN). The High-level Panel on the Post-2015 Development Agenda (HLP), which includes the EU Commissioner for Development, Andris Piebalgs, has been established to negotiate a new framework. At its first meeting in September, the UN Secretary General, Ban Ki Moon, asked it to “be bold, but be practical”.

Being bold but practical seems to be very sage advice from the world’s chief diplomat, for the demands placed on the HLP and expectations for the post-2015 framework are huge.

Since their establishment in 2000, the MDGs have been successful in driving the development agenda – making real progress in reducing levels of extreme poverty as a result. However, progress has been challenging in conflict-affected and fragile states. Indeed, we know that the original MDGs did not include any targets to tackle issues around conflict and fragility. And yet, as the UN has pointed out, ‘60% of the undernourished, 61% of the impoverished, 65% of people without access to safe water and 70% of infant deaths occur in fragile or conflict-affected countries’. In short, as the World Bank put it, ‘no low income conflict affected or fragile state has yet achieved a single MDG’.

So the question is not whether the post-2015 framework should include a focus on building peace and security in fragile countries, but rather how it does this.

Thankfully, there are a number of recent peacebuilding and conflict prevention frameworks from which to draw on, including the World Development Report 2011, and the Peacebuilding and Statebuilding Goals (PSGs) which are set out in the New Deal for Engagement in Fragile States. Saferworld’s analysis of these frameworks highlights seven key areas of convergence and agreement about what is needed to build peace and security in fragile states. It also shows clearly that six out of seven of these areas are not currently addressed within the MDG framework. We have formulated these seven areas in seven issue areas that need to be addressed in the new framework:

1. all social groups have access to decent livelihoods
2. all states are able to manage revenues and perform core functions effectively and accountably
3. all social groups can participate in the decisions that affect society
4. all social groups have equal access to justice
5. all social groups have access to fair, accountable social service delivery
6. all social groups feels secure
7. the international community effectively addresses the external stresses that lead to conflict.

The rationale for focusing on these issues is explained in more detail in our briefing paper (see below). However, it is clear that they are worth addressing, not only because they may contribute to building peace and security, but also because they contribute to the protection of human rights and economic development, as well as being ends in themselves.

The HLP will present its report and recommended new framework in May 2013. Given this short timeframe, the value in drawing on existing frameworks and agreements as the basis for incorporating these goals on peacebuilding, security and statebuilding is clear. But there are difficulties incorporating these broad objectives into a new global framework – namely developing practical and deliverable targets. To help with this, more than 50 peacebuilding and development organisations from around the world have endorsed a joint statement to help develop a holistic post-2015 framework that promotes peace, security and human rights as part of sustainable development (see below). This highlights the need for targets that deal with the drivers and not just the symptoms of conflict, and ensuring that targets for peace are not optional for states.

The EU will be a key player throughout this process. As the biggest aid provider in the world, it wants to have a say in the design of a new framework. In his capacity as a member of the HLP, Commissioner Piebalgs will bring the EU’s views on a post-2015 framework to the negotiating table. The 27 EU development ministers who met on 16 October in Luxembourg issued a statement stressing that a ‘comprehensive EU approach’ should learn lessons from the current framework and address its gaps, including ‘fragility and conflict or post-conflict situations’. This is a positive, albeit timid, start for the EU which has not been very vocal so far. It is crucial that a key development stakeholder such as the EU becomes a more outspoken supporter of the inclusion of peace and security in a post-2015 framework. This bolder approach to supporting positive change would draw directly from a number of recent EU initiatives, including the adoption in 2011 of the Agenda for Change, which set out a new development agenda for the EU, and the European Commission’s communications on EU support for sustainable change in transition societies, and European engagement with civil society in external relations.

As the HLP undertakes its deliberations and consultations with governments, citizens, and civil society organisations around the world, it will be subject to sustained lobbying for a variety of issues to be maintained, added or removed from the post-2015 framework. If the framework is to be meaningful and deliverable, not every pet issue can be included, so it is important that the EU and the HLP draw on the lessons (both positive and negative) and evidence of doing development in these most difficult contexts, which is exactly what being bold and practical should be all about.

THE POST-2015 DEVELOPMENT FRAMEWORK (PART 2)

What should replace the UN’s Millennium Development Goals?

By Chris Underwood – Senior Policy Advisor, International Alert

International Alert has called for a radically different approach to the UN’s Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) in our written submission to the UK’s International Development Committee (IDC).

We outline why the MDGs haven’t worked well from a peace-building perspective and suggest a more appropriate model for post-2015. ‘If the post-2015 framework is to deliver for the poorest and most vulnerable people in the world, radically different is what it must be,’ it reads.

The submission is in response to an IDC inquiry on post-2015 development goals and is part of our continued work on the topic. This includes coordinating global civil society’s policy input into the UN’s thematic consultation on how post-2015 goals relate to conflict and disaster as part of the Beyond 2015 coalition.

Here is a summary of the recommendations we submitted:

Experience in conflict-affected and fragile countries, where over 1.5 billion people live and where there are the greatest levels of poverty and least progress towards the MDGs, suggests that the post-2015 development framework must meet the following principles:

- Development, not aid: concerned with sustainable development progress, not just aid
- Comprehensive: covering all the issues that, taken together, comprise development progress
- Universality and subsidiarity: applying to all countries equally, but with strategies defined, goals and indicators set, and progress measured by the least centralised authority able to do so
- Democracy-enhancing: enhancing accountability by governments to their citizens, and international organisations to their member states
- Overarching values: explicitly restating a commitment to the fulfilment of equal human rights
- Politically aware: getting a viable balance between technical and political sides of development
- Context as the starting point: with goals and strategies based on a full analysis of the context, and priorities devised to suit the national, regional or local realities
- Conflict-sensitivity: recognising that development processes have an impact on conflicts, and designing them to minimise the risk of violence and maximise progress towards peace.

A framework that we think can express these principles would work as follows:

1. A globally agreed vision sets out in broad terms what a more “sustainably developed” world might look like – an overarching vision of human progress, as the Millennium Declaration was. This global vision does not contain quantifiable targets but provides guidance so individual states, regional organisations and other actors can set their appropriate goals, targets and indicators. It enshrines human rights and emphasises the need to make progress towards a situation in which people everywhere:
   - have access to justice and equality before the law
   - participate in decisions which affect their lives, and live in supportive communities
   - are safe and secure
   - have access to economic opportunities
   - improve and maintain their physical and psychological health, levels of education, decent shelter and other aspects of personal and family wellbeing.

2. To make progress towards realising this vision, the main unit of planning, monitoring and evaluation is and remains the nation state. Here, context-specific goals and strategies would be set according to the political cycle and other realities of the context. As far as possible, plans would be developed and implemented in a participatory way and would be designed to enable the local initiatives which remain critical for development progress. As each government finds appropriate and as opportunity offers, goal-setting and strategies for implementation would be taken up within regional organisations – the African Union (AU), the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), the EU and so on. Each national plan would explicitly express the overarching vision.

3. Further partners are to be found in international entities such as intergovernmental organisations (IGOs) and large multinational companies (MNCs). The IGOs would define their own strategies and goals, each according to its mandate, linking them to the international framework and to national strategies as appropriate. The MNCs would also be encouraged to show how they plan to contribute.

This framework is radically different from the approach based on targets and indicators that are neither comprehensive nor universal in the current MDGs. If the post-2015 framework is to deliver for the poorest and most vulnerable people in the world, radically different is what it must be.

EPLO is the platform of European NGOs, networks of NGOs and think tanks which are committed to peacebuilding and the prevention of violent conflict. EPLO's mission is to influence the EU to be more active and more effective at promoting peace and preventing violent conflict throughout the world.

EPLO wants the EU to recognise the crucial connection between peacebuilding, the eradication of poverty, and sustainable development worldwide and the crucial role NGOs have to play in sustainable EU efforts for peacebuilding, conflict prevention, and crisis management.

EPLO advances the interests of its members through common policy positions and consequently advocating for those common positions. EPLO disseminates information and promotes understanding of EU policies of concern to its members. The Office also builds solidarity and cooperation amongst its members and with other relevant NGO networks.

Finally, EPLO raises awareness about the contribution the EU should make to peacebuilding and the need to hold the EU accountable to its own political commitments of helping secure peace within and outside its borders.

EPLO welcomes applications from peacebuilding organisations.

The next deadline for membership applications will be 1 May 2013.
